YARON MILLER Pew Charitable Trusts

Yaron Miller leads the state policy and campaigns portfolio of Pew's energy modernization project, which works with state and federal policymakers to modernize the grid to meet increasing energy demand. He previously worked on Pew's efforts to address the National Park Service's deferred maintenance, where he developed support among businesses and gateway communities throughout the country and secured bipartisan congressional backing for the Great American

Outdoors Act. He has also worked on the flood-prepared communities project, where he oversaw the development, passage, and implementation of policies to help states and communities mitigate flood risk and reduce recovery costs. This work included advocacy at the state legislative and executive levels and resulted in more than $1.7 billion in new funding for nature-based mitigation programs and commitments from state policymakers for comprehensive resilience planning to reduce flood risk. Before coming to Pew, Yaron served as the director of national outreach for a conservation nonprofit group and worked on electoral campaigns throughout the country. He holds a bachelor's degree in political science and environmental studies from St. Mary's College of Maryland and a master's in environmental management from Duke University.
